

MONITORIAL.

For the Portland Gazette.
To dissipate all the vices, which disturb society, affect private happiness, or wound religion, if not impossible, presents at least a task, from which the most extensive abstinence would shrink. Altho' I have occasionally hinted at the violation of the Sabbath, yet my limits preclude any consideration of the evils resulting from it. Other reasons unnecessary to mention, have led to the selection of the single vice of intemperate drinking, and to a consideration of the disregard to the laws relative to drunkenness. Even this view of the subject comprehends too much. Religion has, therefore, been excluded from any particular attention; not because it was the least important; but because it is so evident to every one, how completely its precepts are violated, and its influence destroyed by the excessive use of ardent spirits. No argumentation could make this plainer; no powers of eloquence could excite an emotion so strong and lively, as the Christian has often experienced. Let me then explicitly state, that the baleful influence of drunkenness upon private enjoyment and public prosperity, and the injury to the former and danger to the latter of suffering the laws on the subject to be violated with impunity, are the only two propositions I have undertaken to maintain. Every thing else contained in these pieces, is designed simply to accelerate a reformation. Whether this reformation ought not to have been expressly stated before, it is now too late to enquire. I will observe only, that, when writing the first Essay, I had never expected to write a second on the subject.

But I return from this digression, mindful of the promise at the close of my last. I fear it will seem to some like solemn mockery seriously to undertake to prove, that those are without justification or excuse, who intentionally and habitually transgress the boundaries of laws, acknowledged by all disinterested judges to be good. Yet this is necessary; for many are easily led astray: not for the want of powers of judging, but for the want of using them. Refuse their attention to both sides of the question, and, in cases like the one before us, their judgments will seldom be wrong. Besides, those who violate the laws, are often the dupes of their own sophistry. We should, indeed, hardly be able to comprehend, how a man could deceive himself, did not the frequency of the fact make the proposition intelligible. So much influence has the heart over the understanding. Let us then for the sake of clearness and simplicity use a little formality. Let us in the first place observe, that every law may, and the best laws often do operate to the harm, loss, or inconvenience of individuals. We do not, however, on this account call them bad. We consider it a mark of the imperfection of all human things. But the laws now under consideration, are peculiarly exempt from this exception. They are seldom violated without individual injury. Let none then be led away by the weak pretence of the necessity of a dram in January or July, or a better before breakfast. Nineteen times out of twenty, they are absolutely injurious; and physicians will tell you so. Let it also be remembered, that profits, direct or indirect, which are made by violating laws, do not afford a shadow of excuse for so doing. On the contrary, they rather aggravate the guilt. We should feel much more indignation at a rich thief, if one could be found, than we do at a poor one. These two observations should be well considered; for many, who pass for very reasonable men, have erred here. As if the world must turn out for the imaginary taking of individuals; or money could entitle to abolition of crimes.

We will now state, and briefly refute the arguments in justification of the practice. 1st Argu. The laws themselves are unnecessary and severe. Who says so? A party concerned. They will then be both party and judge? Disinterested persons think otherwise; and they have the best claim to decide. But suppose the laws are bad; is this the way to obtain redress? Let those, who are aggrieved, bring their cause before the great Constitutional court of the Commonwealth, the Legislature of the State. Their deliberations, and, I think, repeated decision is, however, already known. What then becomes of the plea? Besides, the principle here assumed is very dangerous. It is destructive of all subordination and government. A few interested or dissatisfied individuals may pronounce the abrogation of any law, and there is an end of it. O madness! What reasoning is this?

2nd Argu. Those who love spirituous liquors, will have them; and they may as well be supplied by me, as from any other quarter. The first half of this is false in fact, the other is false in argument. People would not drink so much rum, were grog-shops, as they are sometimes emphatically called, to stop selling by small quantities. Every man's observation can tell the truth of this. Who has not observed or heard of the influence of a grog shop recently opened in a village, where there was none before?—As to the other part, viz.—That, because men will drink excessively, it is not criminal to supply them; it may be briefly stated thus: Men will poison themselves; therefore, it is lawful to hold the poison to their lips—men will slay themselves; therefore, it is right to put daggers into their hands. This is precisely the complexion of the argument. If not, let it be disproved.

3d Argu. Travellers stand in need of ardent spirits.—They do not; and I appeal again to all well informed physicians. They may wish for it. Besides, taverns are established for their accommodation.

4th Argu. Well, stop others, and I will then stop.—This is a good argument. You sir, whoever you are, that make use of it, are one of these others; and I have no doubt civil officers will do their duty.

These are all the pleas, excuses, justifications, arguments, palliations (I know not what to call them) that I have ever heard. I disavow the remarks on them without comment, and leave others to judge whether I have fulfilled my promise. Let me just remark, that these are not the reasons why the laws, that prohibit the retailing of spirituous liquors, are broken. Money is at the bottom. And perhaps we might travel far enough to find men, who could tell us to an iota, at what price they valued the stability of a free government, the peace of civil society, the happiness of their fellow men, and their own reputation—and all this in Dollars, Cents, and Mills.
